

emerging forms of togetherness

photographs and text by Tiffany Skogan

I chose emerging forms of togetherness from observing my 2 kids and watching them develop and emerge from the last couple of really hard years. I took these photos of them over the last couple of weeks which were leading up to and including spring break. While they are together along, togetherness doesn't always mean together. At times it's just in the vicinity of.

These two lost a lot over the last couple years, but what they didn't lose was each other. They lost important people and places they loved to go, but they were together through all of it. Sure, they have me that will never change. However, these two go through life together in a different way. A way that only siblings can. During these last couple of years they've at times really only had each other. They are complete opposites; they always have been from the moment they were conceived. But now they are learning to complement each other in ways I never expected. They fight like cats and dogs I'm sure that's normal. But where one lacks the other one shines and watching how that has evolved their relationship has been quite neat.

SECRET MESSAGE No. 24

SECRET MESSAGE No. 24

Thank you for joining in on this togetherness journey with us!